Commentary

The economic data coming out of Asia during July clearly improved against earlier the 2nd quarter. Exports in China, Taiwan and South Korea improved, regional unemployment is falling and China's GDP for Q2 was 6.9% above expectations. The commodity segment also reflected the better economic outlook. New money entering the Asian Asset Class is clearly preferring index funds. Large cap stocks are profiting from this while small cap indexes have been underperforming during the month. The Technology sector corrected during the month as investors questioned the high valuations of the leaders like Baidu, Tencent, Alibaba, etc. The profit taking hit tech heavy weighted indexes like Taiwan and South Korea. Still, we believe this markets remain attractive. The inability of the Trump administration to pass its economic agenda and continued personal reshuffling at the White House are clearly weakening the US Dollar. The Euro is the main beneficiary of this trend. Negative news flow comes mostly from the Geopolitical side. North Korea launched successfully an intercontinental missile, improving dramatically his technology and target range. The political honeymoon between Xi Jinping and Trump is over and relations between Russia and the United States just fell apart with new sanctions passed by the US congress. The fund rose by 0.02% during the month, underperforming its Benchmark MSCI Far East local by 2.25%. The return year to date is 7.55%. The best performing countries in the fund were Thailand, Japan and China. The sell-off in technology hurt our investments in South Korea and Taiwan. Financials, Health Care and Industrials were the strongest sectors in the fund, while technology, Basic Materials and Consumer Services underperformed. Investments in South Korea, Taiwan, Thailand and Indonesia suffered from the strengthening of the Euro as well. We maintain the HKD and JPY mostly hedged to reduce currency volatility in the fund. We also continue to see market valuations as fundamentally attractive on a medium term view.
